

Abstract of the Disclosure

In a method of analyzing a sample, an internal pressure of a sample chamber is maintained at a predetermined level through a control valve. When the sample is injected into the sample chamber, the control valve is held at an opening degree before the sample is injected into the sample chamber for a predetermined period of time. Thus, a substantial amount of the sample injected to the sample chamber can be sent to a detector without loosing through the control valve.